Revisit the 14-day rule

Studies of human development in vitro are on a collision course with an international policy that limits embryo research to the first two weeks of development, warn Insoo Hyun, Amy Wilkerson and Josephine Johnston.

This week, two groups report that they have sustained human embryos in vitro for 12–13 days^{1,2}. Embryos normally implant in the wall of the uterus at around day seven. Until now, no one had reported culturing human embryos in vitro beyond nine days³, and rarely have they been sustained for more than seven. This latest advance comes only

21 months after the researchers at the Rockefeller University in New York City (some of whom are involved in the latest embryo-culturing work) announced that, under certain conditions, individual human embryonic stem cells can self-organize into structures akin to the developmental stages of embryos soon after implantation⁴ (see "Two advances in human developmental biology⁵). The cells were obtained from pre-existing stem-cell lines (derived from 4–5-day-old embryos donated through fertility clinics). In principle, these two lines of research could lead to scientists being able to study all aspects of early human development with unprecedented precision. Yet these advances also put human developmental
