Search now By: Vanessa BlanchardADHD can create a ton of problems in the workplace, its true. But it also comes with an enormous number of strengths. Not necessarily superhero powers, though. More like everyday, normal person strengths.Unfortunately, workplaces (and society at large) tend to take the same, inflexible approach to adults with ADHD: this isnt real, but also youre in trouble for having it.This generalized, somewhat gaslighting approach to confronting ADHD is a large part of what makes things like employment so hard. There are ways to make things easier though.The key is to acknowledge the symptoms and struggles of ADHD rather than confront them. Just like autism, ADHD is neurological and can present itself in many ways. There will be a range of traits and symptoms that you exhibit. Finding a job thats a good fit will depend on the person and how ADHD affects their lives.So, we made a quiz that will help you determine what kinds of jobs work best for you. In your results, weve included a small overview of the types of jobs you might thrive with. Weve also gathered a few suggestions of specific jobs to explore.
