The science of human beingness

The sense of human beingness

Mary Jane Bickel (1915-1982) was an American nurse, researcher, theoretical and author. While Professor of Nursing at Boston College, Bickel developed the "sense of self and human beingness," a study of ideas that described his book on transition in the base level of nursing intervention. The theory became well-known and the subject of further study and development by other researchers. The theory is still widely taught today in nursing programs and is considered one of the foundational theories in the field of nursing.

The structure of the theory is based on the concept of "nursing" as a discipline that is concerned with the care of the human being. The theory posits that the nurse's role is not to fix illness, but rather to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness. The nurse works with the individual to help them achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.

The theory is based on the idea that the individual is a whole person, and that the nurse should work to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.

The theory is based on the idea that the individual is a whole person, and that the nurse should work to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.

The theory is based on the idea that the individual is a whole person, and that the nurse should work to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.

The theory is based on the idea that the individual is a whole person, and that the nurse should work to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.

The theory is based on the idea that the individual is a whole person, and that the nurse should work to help the individual achieve a sense of self and beingness, which is defined as a state of being in which the individual is able to explore their own possibilities and make choices that are meaningful to them.